Puppy Separation Anxiety

Do you know how to spot puppy separation anxiety? A sign that he is might include constant whimpering, this is especially more likely to occur at night. Once he was one of many and now he finds himself alone with strange beings, no wonder he is frightened. Be patient and start puppy dog training immediately as one way to help your puppy deal with the separation anxiety issues.

Training is a great way to boost your puppy's confidence and to get him accustomed to his new surroundings and routine.. Remember like most babies, puppies will get anxious at night and will need nurturing so remember you may loose some sleep.. It is very easy to let your adorable puppy on to your bed, but when fully grown it may get a little uncomfortable so make sure he has his own bed.. Let your dog know where he is supposed to sleep at night and make sure the environment is comfortable and den-like. A ticking clock eases a puppy's stress and acts like a heart beat, whether in the room or under his bedding.. Once surrounded by his mother, brother and sisters, the ticking clock will remind him of them.. Used during training, this has been successful with puppy's of puppies..

If your puppy is whining during the night when you first get him, give him some positive dog training by coming to him when he is whimpering and consoling him. This is will reassure him that someone else is around.. Once into his routine you should not need to do this every night so that it does not become a habit.. Maybe get up once or twice to comfort and reassure him at night for the first few days or week.

Puppy training involves many factors and just training him to sit and stay is not complete K9 dog training. You don't want your dog to just learn to follow commands, you also want your dog to be happy and feel loved. The happier and more loved a dog feels the more receptive he is going to be to dog training in general. Remember, use positive dog training when helping your cure your puppy separation anxietyPositive training will help Positive training will help alleviate any anxiety your puppy has.
